ABSTRACT

     A system receives a file index associated with multiple localized strings of data and loads the file index into a memory device. The system then identifies pointers to frequently used localized strings and caches the identified pointers. Requests for Web content are then processed by the system.